Supply Chain Emissions Reporting

Global supply chains are often the main contributor to a business's carbon footprint, with some studies suggesting they are responsible for up to 60% of global CO<sub>2</sub> emissions. The ability to quantify the carbon footprint is important because it allows supply chain participants to map and identify the carbon emissions associated with every step of their value chain.

Carbon transparency is transforming stakeholder interaction. Increasingly, purchasers are requiring supply chain partners to provide emissions data and financiers are offering greater access to capital for businesses that can disclose their carbon intensity. As governments begin to introduce carbon legislation, understanding your emissions now can help prepare your business for the future.

Our integrated logistics system combines Vallis's marine and cargo data with an AI-powered carbon accounting platform provided by CarbonChain. This enables the emissions associated with the production and movement of goods to be tracked and recorded for public or private reporting requirements, providing a baseline assessment for emission reduction targets and carbon compensation planning.
